Between Continuity and Discontinuity:
A Few Comments on the Post-war Development of Polish Historical Research

by Rafał Stobiecki

The majority of historians agree that social and political realities significantly influence changes in historical thinking, and thereby the development of historical research. When, however, we inquire into the mechanism or mechanisms regulating such influence, controversies become evident. Differences in viewpoint result from the fact that the relationship which exists between historiography and social life is understood differently. Risking a certain simplification one may state that interpretations tend to vary between two extremes. A number of historians are of the opinion that we are dealing with a direct one-way influence of social reality on historiography as a specific form of social memory. This view is upheld by Marxist historiography. The eminent Soviet mediaeval historian Evgenii A. Kosminskii wrote:

From the Marxist point of view historiography is just one of the disciplines of the history of social thought, and it is therefore always clearly and closely connected with politics. By various means – sometimes visible, at other times invisible – bourgeois ideology is able to infiltrate historiography together with those achievements of bourgeois historiography which we both appreciate and make use of.\(^1\)

Other historians, who are usually distant from Marxism, like to view the development of historical research above all in terms of its autonomous transformation. As far as the post-war development of Polish historiography is concerned, it is – in my opinion – useful to take into account not only the influence of the “environment” in which it had to evolve, but also its internal transformations (needless to say, these were not always the result of changes in the social and political sphere).

In the face of the profound changes which are currently taking place in Poland, it is quite natural that there arises the need to evaluate the past 45 years. This evaluation is being performed by various generations of Poles: both by those who remember the birth of the new system, as well as by those whose main generational experience occurred during the seventies and eighties, i.e. the period of its crisis and subsequent collapse. More and more frequently there appear reflexions concerning the first years of existence of the new Polish state, which is commonly termed the Third Republic. When, therefore, we look back at the post-war development of Polish historical research, the periodization 1945–1989 and 1989–? tends to force itself on us and is treated as something obvious and not subject to discussion. However, it is necessary to keep in mind the dangers resulting from the application of these turning points. First of all, they suggest that the collapse of the Polish Communist system played a decisive role in changes in Polish historiography because it finally freed it from the dominant influence of ideology, and thereby created new and exceptionally favourable conditions for its future development. Was this really the case? We shall try to answer this question further on in the present paper. What is more, forcing Polish historiography into the framework of these dates is frequently connected with a desire to juxtapose, as some think, the dubious output of historiography during the Polish People's Republic with its unquestionable achievements since 1989. This marks a return to the interpretative practices of the bygone era – based on the same black and white pattern. Another undoubted drawback of such an approach is the mechanical transferral of border dates from the social and political sphere to other disciplines (historical science in the present case), which would suggest that we are dealing with a mechanism whereby political events or decisions exert a direct and one-way influence on culture, science or the economy. While accepting the aforementioned periodization, we would like to treat it primarily as symbolic in order to avoid – in so far as it is possible – the aforementioned dangers.

The great majority of the Polish people tended to view the end of the Second World War as a dramatic break with the hitherto existing world, and also as the symbolic beginning of a new reality, which was generally thought of as being alien and imposed from the outside. The process of reorientation and reevaluation that fell to the lot of Polish historiography after 1945 was to a large extent a reaction against wartime experiences on the one hand, and connected with the birth of a new political and social order on the other. It is worthwhile to take note that Polish historiography was no exception. After the war a crisis of history encompassing both its universal dimension and historical research was openly talked about. The awareness of the need for change was common amongst Polish historians. In the first post-war issue of Kwartalnik Historyczny (dated 1946), the official organ of the Polish Historical Society, we read:

These changes are not solely political alterations to the map of the world, nor are they only social and economic refurbishments of the political system, but gigantic changes in mentality and outlook taking place in our internal personality. It may be that we are not fully aware of this, but all of us, to a greater or lesser extent, feel that under the influence of wartime experiences, under the influence of what we have seen and heard during those long years full of terror, something has changed within us; we feel that we are returning to our research transformed, with a newly formed or only gradually forming view on many social and political issues that are quite different from our earlier perception. Internally – if not openly – we approve of many things that would have previously outraged us and, conversely, abhor or at least react with distaste to things which we used to approve of wholeheartedly or felt convenient to tolerate. But, and this above all, we historians feel the need to become conscious of our present attitude to history precisely because we feel that even here there has occurred within us and, indeed, is still occurring something like an involuntary revision of outlook, some profound change in views about what constituted and will continue to constitute the subject of our professional interest, passion and creative research.

---

As far the development of Polish historical research is concerned, the first post-war years were characterized by an advanced pluralism. This concerned both the organizational (personnel, institutions) and methodological sphere, and information disseminated by historiography (interpretative canons, its thematic horizon). There prevailed an atmosphere of discussion and polemic, in which the search for “new paths for Polish historiography” – to use the term coined by Henryk Barycz – went on. Historians tried to find their feet in the new reality, to supply various answers to the challenges that it posed. Contemporary realities determined with a fair degree of precision both the possible field of compromise between authority and historical circles, and – to a considerable extent – the arena of inevitable conflict. The following question gained fundamental importance: should Polish historiography continue, even with certain far-reaching changes, the traditions of Polish historical research of the interwar period, or should it completely discard models set during the years 1918–1939 and embark upon a comprehensive reedification of its organisational structures, methodological foundations and interpretative canons? Two conceptions were therefore ranged against each other – one based firmly on the idea of the autonomy of science, untrammelled research, and methodological pluralism, the other – initially not voiced explicitly – presupposing the thorough reconstruction of the theoretical precepts of historiography, the subordination of science to the state, and aspiring to spread the monopoly and control of the state apparatus over the entirety of scientific life.

With a certain degree of simplification one may state that Polish historians took one of two opposing stands. Władysław Konopczyński, a professor at Cracow’s Jagiellonian University who enjoyed considerable respect among fellow historians, wrote in 1947:

Are there sufficient grounds for demanding that our historiography radically sever all ties with the past and enter upon an entirely new path? Our answer is this: there are no such grounds. The nation – as opposed to the state – was proceeding along its appropriate path of historical development, historians performed their duties with a reasonable degree of accuracy, they searched for truth freely and honestly, without restricting themselves to any preconceived ideas or modes of thought. Therefore our motto will be as follows: to rebuild and partly reconstruct on old foundations using old materials. Corrections – even significant ones – will be useful, but revolutions and acrobatics are ruled out.

For communistic and communizing circles, such views were unacceptable. The group of historians connected with the authorities’ camp – initially weak and devoid of any importance – discarded the idea of continuity, and this for fundamental reasons. The new historiography was to be a denial of prewar historiography in many respects. In the opinion of numerous contemporary advocates of change, Polish historiography was characterized by, among other things, a disregard of the role played by social and economic processes, insensitivity to the laws and rules that govern the historical process, a naïve psychologism, and, finally, a tendency to look at history from the point of view of elites. The remedy for all the problems troubling Polish history writing was to be looked for in Marxism. Józef Sieradzki, a political commentator and historian, wrote in 1945:

Today, history has at its disposal a precise and well tested method; it classifies phenomena and determines the rules that govern them. This is the path which leads to its rebirth and provides for the inflow of new forces. Such is the contribution of historical materialism.

The reedification of Polish historiography on the basis of the theory of historical materialism – which was, indeed, variously interpreted at the begimming (not only in the spirit of Stalinist orthodoxy) – became the chief goal of the authorities and the initially insignificant circles of communistic and communizing intelligentsia that assisted them. Not all of the dilemmas that faced historical research and historians were solved during the first post-war years. Two reasons may be put forward. First of all, the aspirations of the authorities, which aimed at a thorough rebuilding of scientific life, exceeded their physical resources, i.e. personnel and organizational potential. As a result – to name but one example – the “Memorandum for internal use concerning the organization of science”, ordered by Jakub Berman and drawn up by Ludwik Sawicki as early as 16 January 1945, in which the idea of subordinating science to the state (i.e. to the Communist authorities) was expressed, remained a list of postulates and wishes. Secondly, an important role was played by the tactics employed by the Polish Communists directly after their seizure of power. The leader of the Hungarian Communists, Mátyás Rákosi, dubbed them “salami tactics”, that is the gradual subordination of successive spheres of social life. With reference to Polish science and culture it was carried on under the banner of the “gentle revolution”, a term coined by Jerzy Borejsza. It turned out to be nothing less than an introduction to the policy of Stalinization, which was initiated a few years later.

5 WŁADYSŁAW KONOPCZYŃSKI: Zadania nauki w Polsce dzisiejszej [The Tasks before Historical Research in Present-Day Poland], in: Nauka Polska 1947, vol. 25, p. 155. W. Konopczyński (1880–1952) – historian, researcher of 18th century Polish history. Before the war elected MP from the list of the Związek Ludowo-Narodowy, ZLN (National People’s Union). At the beginning of the war arrested during “Sonderaktion Krakau”, detained in Sachsenhausen concentration camp until 1940. After the war he was nominated president of the Polish Historical Society, though he officiated only for a short time. At the turn of 1948 he became the focus of a vociferous witch-hunt instigated by the authorities. He was subsequently forced to resign from all important posts and take early retirement.

Differences of opinion within historical circles, and also between historians and the authorities did not, however, exclude the possibility of reaching an understanding or even a far-reaching compromise. The idea that linked the ruling elite with historical circles was the need for a historical justification of the state’s new borders. On the basis of decisions reached at two conferences – in Yalta and Potsdam – these were shifted far to the west and north, thereby encompassing territories that for hundreds of years had formed a part of Germany. History and historians were tasked with documenting the actual or imaginary Polishness of these lands. There occurred a veritable outburst of literature concerning this issue. The majority of historians considered taking up this subject matter a patriotic duty. The reference to the idea of Piast Poland was part of a search for a general line of development of the Polish state, as well as an attempt at reinterpreting national history from the point of view of contemporariness. The return to “the land of our fathers” – as the Western Lands and Pomerania were called – was interpreted as a return to the traditions of the early-mediaeval Polish state, to the glorious days of Mieszko I and the Boleslaus rulers. Historical analogies were looked for, 7 This is the view expressed by PIOTR HÜBNER: Nauka polska po II wojnie światowej. Idee i instytucje [Polish Science after World War II. Ideas and Institutions], Warszawa 1987, p. 26. Jakub Berman was a member of the Political Bureau of the Polish Worker’s Party (and later of the Polish United Worker’s Party) responsible for ideological affairs. L. Sawicki (1893–1972) – archaeologist, from 1945 to 1949 director of the Archaeological Museum in Warsaw.

---

while the centuries old Polish-German antagonism was strongly accented. The then widespread acceptance of the concept of Piast Poland was combined with severe criticism of the Jagiellonian idea as enshrined in the tradition of the Commonwealth of Both Nations; its anti-Russian (i.e. anti-Soviet) sentiment was given strong emphasis. The new Poland was supposed to be the historical antithesis of the state which had existed before the partitions, and of the interwar Republic. Flagrant and intentional misinterpretations were commonplace. In one of the contemporary publications we read:

The author's manifest desire is to prove that the present relinquishment of the princely-kingly, Lithuanian-Polish Jagiellonian concept and the final return to the folk concept of Piast Poland is of paramount importance for post-war Poland. That shifting of the People's Republic's borders to the west, towards the very centre of mid-twentieth century Europe, has brought with it conditions of security, development and power which the First and Second Republies could never have possessed (emphasis - R.S.).

At the end of the forties, in fundamentally altered internal (the elimination of all legal and illegal opposition) and international (the inception of the Cold War) circumstances, the Stalinization of Polish historiography was begun. Stalinism in historical research was an attempt at creating an ideological vision of the future in order to endow the totalitarian system brought into being by the party-state with a modicum of legitimacy. This goal was to be attained by two methods: the recasting of historiography's methodological foundations on the one hand, and the reshaping or liquidation of old and the creation of new organizational structures on the other. As we remember, the idea of redefining the methodology of Polish historiography had been formulated in the years 1944–1945. However, at the beginning of the fifties it gained a radically different significance. Historians were quick to discover that the switch to Marxism was now a sine qua non of their continued participation in scientific life. What is more, Marxism had been codified. From this moment on, only one interpretation was allowed; this had been tersely though consistently set forth in the "History of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union (Bolshevik). Short course". Zanna Kormanowa, a leading representative of the group of historians who were engaged in the realization of the policy of Stalinization, had this to say at the First Congress of Polish Science in July 1951:

The decisive moment in the struggle for a new, Marxist history is concerned with methodology. History which is not based on Marxist methodology, which is not built on the assumptions of historical materialism, is scientifically barren and cannot be called a science in the full meaning of the word. The task of ensuring that this obvious truth is realized by the majority of research workers active in the humanities, and especially in the field of history, is daunting, but none the less feasible (emphasis - R.S.).

---

The imposition of one methodology and the ensuing restriction of the terms 'science' and 'scientific' to embrace only knowledge that was based on the theory of historical materialism marked a turning-point in the post-war development of Polish historiography. It was a concerted attempt at calling into question the entire output of historians' work, finally severing the few remaining ties that still connected it with Western scholarship. It marked the liquidation of the last vestiges of pluralism that remained in historical methodology, and the actual collapse of all methodological discussions. The dichotomic division into "scientific" (i.e. Marxist) historiography on the one hand, and unscientific, barren bourgeois historiography on the other made any true polemics impossible. In the Stalinist theory of history, methodology was considered equal to ideology. Competing interpretations were replaced with one interpretation, the multiplicity of truths was brutally superseded by the truth of the Party. The authorities aimed at creating an official, truly totalitarian historiography, which entailed the elimination of all competing visions of the past.

Within the Stalinist interpretation of the theory of historical materialism itself, the most important role was played by the theory of social and economic formations. This was based on the assumption that the historical process has an essential, intentional, and orderly character. Said theory functioned as a panhistorical pattern, as "an obligatory timetable for those journeying through world history". As a result, it fell to Polish historians to display – on the basis of exceptionally one-sided factographical material – the veracity of the thesis that the founding of the People’s Republic was the final product of the Polish historical process. This was said to have occurred through the implacable and inevitable judgements passed by History. Had the declared [ŻANNA KORMANOWA:] Referat Podsekcji Historii. I Kongres Nauki Polskiej. Sekcja Nauk Społecznych i Humanistycznych. Powielone na prawach rękopisu do użytku uczestników I-go Kongresu Nauki Polskiej [Paper of the Historical Subsection. First Congress of Polish Science. Social Studies and the Humanities Section. Copied as a manuscript to be used by participants of the first Congress of Polish Science], Warszawa 1951, p. 5. The aim of the first Congress of Polish Science was to bring to an end the process of reedification of the organizational structures of Polish scientific life. Following the liquidation of the Warsaw Scientific Society and the Polish Academy of Learning, a new Polish Academy of Sciences (PAN) – based firmly on the Soviet model – was brought into being. Ž. Kormanowa (1900–1988) – historian of the labour movement, from 1948 professor at the University of Warsaw. Before the war closely connected with the Polish Communist Party, from 1941 to 1944 in the USSR. After the war nominated to various posts; director of the Historical Department of the Institute for Schooling Research Cadres of the Central Committee of the Polish United Worker’s Party (an institution created in 1950 on the model of the Soviet Institute of Red Professors).

---

advocates of this mode of historical thought succeeded in all of the objectives listed above, then Polish historiography would have undoubtedly shared the fate that overtook historical research in the USSR and the German Democratic Republic. But this did not occur. Why? What determined such an outcome?

The first methodological conference of Polish historians, held from 28 December 1951 to 12 January 1952 in Otwock with the manifest objective (this had been predetermined by the Party leadership) of winning a resounding victory on the so-called “historical front”, ended in failure. On the one hand, the most ardent advocates of the Stalinist unification of historical research were simply too weak to impose their will on the majority, while on the other the greatest historical authorities were ready to defend their professional identity and reach a compromise with the Party. The price that had to be paid was often high, but it was thanks to this flexibility that Polish historical research did not become a tool in the hands of the system. Under such conditions the nomination of Tadeusz Manteuffel as director of the Historical Institute of the Polish Academy of Sciences, which was brought into being on 1 January 1953, gained an altogether symbolic importance. This eminent researcher of mediaeval history came from an old aristocratic family that for years had been living on the north-eastern borderland of the old Commonwealth. He was a student of Marceli Handelsman, one of the leading figures in Polish historiography of the prewar period. During the Second World War he had been closely connected with the Polish Underground State, and subsequently became a professor. This nomination, as well as the make-up of the Historical Institute's management, were altogether exceptional for the Communist camp. Probably in none of the other countries that remained under Soviet domination was the management of historical research – of course under the “caring” aegis of the authorities – entrusted to a group of professional historians who had been educated and shaped by “bourgeois science”.

The creation of the Historical Institute of the Polish Academy of Sciences based on the Soviet model – it was a centralized structure designed to supervise and direct historical research – brought the process of organizational reification of Polish historical research to an end. However, contrary to the intentions of the authorities, the Institute did not become a bastion of the “new science”; the credit for this goes above all to its management. Indeed, with time it became the haven of oppositionally inclined members of historical circles.

The year 1956 brought with it a wave of criticism levelled at the methods that had hitherto been employed in scientific policy and at least a partial reevaluation of the Stalinist heritage. As far as the further development of Polish historiography is concerned, the reestablishment of ties with Western science – which, we remember, had been severed in the first half of the fifties – was of paramount importance. The French Annales circle had a special role to play. Paradoxically, it was Marxism that formed the bridge that facilitated the resumption of Polish-French historiographical relationship and its subsequent intensification. In an interview with P. Sainteny (published in 1992), Georges Duby and Bronisław Geremek reminisced about their then and – to a certain extent – still existent fascination for Marxism in the following words: “not [a fascination] for an ideological and political canon, but rather for a mode of thought, a way of understanding history”.

Polish historiography after 1956 only slightly resembled that of the prewar period and was altogether different from the historiography that had prevailed in the first half of the fifties. Its organisational structure had changed, and a new generation had risen to the forefront. This meant that historians who had been educated after the war, in an altered social and political reality, who had already experienced the “Hegelian sting” (to use a term coined by Czesław Miłosz) and lived through the bleak period of the first half of the fifties, were steadily gaining in ascendancy. This circle, while formally not distancing itself from Marxist methodology, wished to free historiography from the dominant influence of ideology and politics, to widen the sphere of professional research. As Witold Kula wrote in “Kwartalnik Historyczny” in 1956:

> The struggle for a Polish Marxist historiography is by no means over, as many would have it (...) let there be a genuine battle of opinions, let there be a specific and substantive discussion. May this lead to the clear-cut delimitation of the border between Marxism and non-Marxism.

The opening up of Marxism to different methodological propositions resulted in the relinquishment of Stalinist orthodoxy and the rebirth of a sui generis methodological pluralism, which, however, continued to be limited by the Party. The Communists had not renounced their plan of creating an official historiography that would represent their interests. The thematic horizon of Polish historiography also began to change after 1956. Following a period that witnessed the domination of literature devoted primarily to social and economic history and the history of the labour movement in the broadest sense interest was renewed in the history of culture, the methodology of history and the history of historiography, the history of social structures (under the marked influence of Annales), as well as in political history and the history of the Church (carried on primarily by the Catholic University of Lublin). A somewhat different entity, which existed on the fringes of historiography

---

The situation of Polish historiography in the sixties and seventies was characterized by a state of sui generis schizophrenia. This is how Stefan Kieniewicz defined it in a paper read at a 1980 meeting of the Historical Committee of the Polish Academy of Sciences:

Its characteristic has been the division of the entire field of vision of our research into two separate categories, each of which functions under differing conditions: the early centuries on the one hand, and contemporary history on the other. A researcher of mediaeval history or even of modern history up to the end of the 19th century is free to choose his topic, formulate views and pass judgement. One may say that even here we encounter obstacles (...). But you will agree with the opinion that such instances are marginal. In general – and as far as research into early history is concerned – there appear and coexist in Poland: monographs and dissertations openly invoking Marxist methodology, works that utilize this methodology with greater or lesser effectiveness without invoking it, and, finally, those, which blithely ignore the Marxist doctrine, even if they do not openly polemicize with it (...). The situation (...) in contemporary history is altogether different. Three categories of problems meet with obstacles when research and publications are involved: the history of antecedents of the grouping that is currently in power; political history (and, in a certain sense at least, the economic history of the People’s Republic); the history of Polish-Soviet, and – looking backward – also Polish-Russian relations.¹⁴

It would appear that the diagnosis presented by Stefan Kieniewicz does not require comment. Polish historiography during the sixties and seventies, and also – though to a lesser extent – in the eighties, functioned in a situation in which the authorities designated the scope of untrammelled scientific research through the agency of censorship. However, the fields reserved for official historiography were shrinking at an alarming rate, so that at the end of the seventies they did not go beyond (with a few exceptions) the year 1939. When mentioning the far-reaching interference of the censor’s office, one cannot overlook the fact that self-censorship constituted its sui generis supplement and was present primarily in the language used in historical works on contemporary history. This was classical doublespeak, designed to create or obscure reality instead of describing and explaining it. In general, it was no longer demanded that historians make an unambiguous methodological (that is political) declaration such as in the years that preceded 1956. They were, however, required to tolerate and participate in the creation of contemporary history in the broad meaning of the term – an official historiography full of falsifications, equivocations, and half-truths. It is worth noting here that with the passage of time doublespeak lost interest in the details and intricacies of factography and focused on assessments and judgements instead. The histories of the war, the occupation, and the People's Republic were depicted from the point of view of the victorious Communists, while everything that even potentially questioned their historical mandate to act as the "guiding force of the nation" was intentionally ignored or discredited. Official historiography was interested in the history of the Polish government in exile, the Home Army, of legal and illegal opposition groups in the first post-war years, and also in the history of conflicts (1956, 1968, 1970, and 1976) between the authorities and the Polish people.

The crisis of the Communist system in Poland and the emergence of the "Solidarity" mass movement exerted an important influence on history and historians. The result of this ferment in the field of historiography was the head-on confrontation between official history and the various 'counter-histories' that began to appear in samizdat as early as the second half of the seventies. It is characteristic that the majority of these historical works were preoccupied with contemporary history. They created an alternative, strongly nationalistic and anti-Communist picture of Polish history. It was in the eighties that émigré historiography, which for obvious reasons had been ignored and discredited for years, was suddenly "discovered" in Poland. The works of pre-eminent émigré historians such as Marian Kukiel and Władysław Pobóg-Malinowski were published in samizdat. It was under the influence of such publications that the picture of 20th century Polish history underwent extensive revision. This concerned primarily Polish-Russian and Polish-Soviet relations, the Polish underground movement of World War II, the occupation, and the first years of the People's Republic. As far as methodology was involved, these works did not introduce anything new. They were written in the spirit of traditional historiography, which was preoccupied with political relations and the role of outstanding individuals; what is more, the great majority were of a publicistic rather than scholarly character. However, it was under the influence of such works that official historiography began to change, too. During the eighties there appeared new depictions of the war years and occupation, and a fundamental rehabilitation of the output of the Polish Underground State (as a matter of fact, this term entered the language of historiography in that very decade) took place. In general, one may say that even before 1989 the monopoly on fundamental issues in contemporary history exercised by official historiography had either been seriously undermined or broken. An important step was made towards freeing history from the dominant influence of ideology and depriving it of the role which it had played for years – that of legitimizing the system. The actual meaning of the Communist philosophy of history was finally revealed. Adam Michnik in his book “On the History of Honour in Poland”, which contains an interesting analysis of the various forms of defiance exercised by Polish intellectuals during the dark era of Stalinism, writes:

History is given meaning by people. To be precise: various people give it various meanings. The same goes for rogues, who sanctify their practices by invoking Progress and Historical Necessity. However, their vision of history is nothing more than a way of deluding themselves and others.16

The events of 1989 and the collapse of the Communist system in Poland undoubtedly played an important role in the process of reorientation and reevaluation of Polish historiography, though I would venture the opinion that one should not overestimate their significance. It would be difficult to support the thesis that they exerted a direct influence on historical research, let alone to claim a revolutionary transformation in the writing of history as a reaction to the regaining of independence. The new social and political reality continues to have a manifold effect on historiography. This was reflected in all fields related to the functioning of historical research – organizational, methodological, and also (or maybe above all) in the picture of Polish history. The profound changes taking place in the country gave rise to an atmosphere of optimism and anticipation directly connected with the new situation in which both history and historians found themselves. In 1989 Adolf Juzwenko, a researcher of contemporary history associated with the democratic opposition, wrote in the reborn weekly “Solidarity”:

The eighties freed Poles from the fear of taking up politics. History is gradually ceasing to be viewed as nothing more than a substitute for politics. It’s as though the interest in history, manifested lately by political activists, is on the ebb. I think that the authorities also attach less importance to it. Let us hope that all this will create an atmosphere conducive to research work and increase the likelihood of history being treated not as a supplement to politics, but above all as a branch of knowledge.17

Contrary to the expectations voiced in the above-quoted article, historiography and historians came under the pressure of contemporary events after 1989. It was not expected that historiography would withdraw into a circle of highly specialized problems and preoccupy itself with its calling, i.e. the search for historical truth, however this may be understood. This was so because society expected the explanation of contemporaneity from historical research. This practice imperceptibly turns into its historical “mandate”, and in extreme cases may even lead to its sacralization or condemnation. It is historiography’s role to depict the past as it “should have been” according to our outlook on life, and the political and religious assumptions of our time.

17 Adolf Juzwenko: Historicy pokorni, historia sterowana [Humble Historians, Guided History], in: Tygodnik Solidarność, 1989, no. 15 (52).
The reality of the period of change inspired and indeed still inspires a return to the past, in which the search for a historical mandate of ideas (more frequently than programmes) expressed by various social and political groupings continues. We are presently dealing with an excess of history or historicization of the common consciousness. As far as the history of the Polish people is concerned, this is nothing new. It has been recognized in literature that:

we constitute (...) a phenomenon amongst societies, a phenomenon because of our attitude towards national history, which appears as an integral part of the common outlook on life, due to the extent of the social “appropriation” of historical events, and due to the specific functioning of this consciousness.\(^{18}\)

However, the conception of the excess of history as used above is imprecise, it should rather be used in the plural or supplemented by the term “many” histories. New visions of the past are coming into being as a result of the relinquishment of an official vision that to a greater or lesser extent legitimized the old system. These are characterised by a manifest (if not actual) “oppositiveness” (opozycyjność), but also by mutual competitiveness.

It is therefore no wonder that after 1989 there came a time for reevaluating the era of “Communist totalitarianism”, as many called it. This reevaluation was carried out with the help and by means of history. Of considerable importance was the fact that during the eighties a second changing of the guard took place (and, indeed, still is taking place) in historical circles. An ever greater role is being played by the generation of researchers who were raised and shaped during the last years of the People’s Republic. There cropped up a dispute – still unresolved – regarding the true character of the Polish People’s Republic, commonly named ‘Communist’. Can one view it as a Polish state or not? Some would like to treat the Republic as nothing more than a Soviet protectorate, and thereby take the period 1945–1989 in sui generis “historical brackets” (one cannot help drawing a parallel between these endeavours and French historiography’s struggle with the tricky problem of Vichy). Others, while perceiving the significance of this state’s extremely limited sovereignty, wish none the less to integrate the Polish People’s Republic into the entirety of nation’s and state’s history. The aforementioned dispute may, albeit with certain reservations, be seen as the Polish variant of the discussion that was instigated by Francis Fukuyama’s famous article entitled “The End of History?” This naturally divided and continues to divide society and historians. It is, however, characteristic that in the case of Poland the controversy surrounding Fukuyama’s article focuses only marginally on the methodological aspects inherent in the idea of the end of history, i.e. criticism of the monolinear, evolutionary, and finalistic way of thinking about the past. One may gather that this is connected with the acute crisis of methodological

---

\(^{18}\) DANUTA ZABŁOCKA: Historia jako wartość [History as a Value], in: Historia i świadomość narodowa [History and National Consciousness], ed. by WŁODZIMIERZ WESOŁOWSKI, Warszawa 1970, p. 32.
reflexion which we are now facing in Poland. To a certain extent this results from the explicable reaction of historical circles against the years of dominance of the “only correct and only veracious” methodology of historical materialism. The attitude which is gaining influence among Polish historians may be called an abstinence from theory, an escape into “pure” factography. It is for this reason that the discussion regarding contemporary history that is currently under way in Poland – of which the dispute over the People’s Republic is only a fragment – frequently, though by no means always (the historiography of this period boasts many valuable works written over the past few years) consists in a simple interchange of signs in which activities hitherto dubbed patriotic are now considered treasonable and vice versa. All too frequently some historians and political commentators, exercising an apparent “divine right”, assign grades in patriotism to their colleagues. This phenomenon has a wider dimension and is also perceived by foreign writers and researchers. The French historian Daniel Beauvois, who conducts research into Polish history, ascertained the recurrence of polonocentrism brought about by the hypertrophy of national feeling, which is visible both in the new canon of nationalistic popular history and in professional research. The same message is to be found in “God’s Playground”, a synthesis of Polish history written already in the seventies by the British historian Norman Davies. In this context it would be helpful to quote a statement made in 1970 by the Polish sociologist Danuta Zabłocka:

The renaissance of historical and national issues will carry out its task not only if it reestablishes values that were once depreciated, but also if it does not withdraw into an ethnocentric, megalomaniacal, and sick shell, if these qualities are purified by a “judgmental” consciousness (...).

A look back at Polish historiography from the vantage points of 1945 and 1989 imposes two differing sets of optics – the pessimistic and the optimistic. The former is naturally directed towards the past and for this reason has – to greater or lesser extent – an evaluative character. We perceive all those negative aspects connected with the attempt – unsuccessful, as we have tried to show – at turning history into an ideological tool for legitimizing the system. The consequences of this policy, realized with a greater or lesser intensity by the Communist authorities, are still visible in Polish historiography. The state of research on 20th century history provides sufficient evidence of this. Some errors are now incorrigible. To quote but one example, the opportunity of collecting the verbal statements of participants of historical events, of Poles living both at home and abroad, has been irretrievably lost. This generation is inevitably receding into the past. The dynamic “Karta” centre, which researches into contemporary history in the broadest meaning of the term, is presently trying to fill this gap. Professional reliability does, however, require that we give fair treatment to the unquestionable and enduring achievements of Polish historical research during the period of the People’s Republic; these are contained in many significant syntheses and monographs that are valued both at home and abroad. The vantage point of 1989 has an altogether different origin and utilizes an entirely different valuation method. Its optimism stems above all from the fact that it is future-oriented, and is connected with new challenges and fresh hopes. In 1994 Henryk Samsonowicz, one of the eminent figures in contemporary Polish historiography and a researcher of mediaeval history, wrote on the changing status of history in Poland and other countries of the former Communist bloc:

20 Zabłocka (cf. footnote 18), p. 36.

(...) the third characteristic of Eastern historiography concerns the fact that history no longer plays a role which goes beyond determining the mechanisms governing the past. It has ceased to be (or, should I say, is ceasing to be) a substitutional measure employed by public institutions to give a sense of self-identity, national value, and distinctness from others. Historiography is retreating from propheticism and mythicism, and turning to the analysis of the course of historical processes. It should be stated that this state of affairs is favourable both for society and for historical research itself.\(^{21}\)

When one takes into consideration the approaching integration of Poland into European structures, it becomes important for this tendency to gain a firm footing. Of equal significance is the warning stemming from the past decades. The danger of history becoming ideologized is still present, and there is no indication whatsoever that it will disappear. Paradoxically, the more often historians make manifest their aversion to methodology, and – knowingly or unknowingly – persist in remaining in a world of “pure” and “objective” history, the greater this danger becomes.

\(^{21}\) Henryk Samsonowicz: Królowie zdegradowani [Degraded Kings], in: Polityka, 1994, no. 1.
Summary

Between continuity and discontinuity. A few comments on the post-war development of Polish historical research

The aim of this article is to reconstruct the process of Polish historiography’s transformation after World War II. The author deals not only with the influence of the political and ideological “atmosphere” in which it evolved, but also with its internal transformations, which were not always the result of changes in the social and political sphere.

A look back at Polish historiography from the vantage points of 1945 and 1989 imposes two differing sets of optics – a pessimistic and an optimistic one. The former, directed towards the past, has a more or less evaluative character. Looking from the first vantage point, we can perceive all those negative aspects connected with the (as we have tried to show) aborted attempt of turning history into an ideological tool for legitimizing the communist system. Nevertheless, the consequences of a politicized historical science are still visible in Polish historiography. However, there should be given fair treatment to the unquestionable and enduring achievements of Polish historical research, expressed in many significant syntheses and monographs published during the period of the People’s Republic.

The vantage point of 1989 is entirely different in its origins and valuation method. Its optimism stems above all from the fact that it is future-oriented and connected with new challenges and fresh hopes.