The concept of the “noble nation” is one of the reasons the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth is considered to have been unique in early modern Europe. Unlike other European nobilities, which directed their primary loyalty toward their ruling dynasty, the nobles in Poland supposedly developed a strong sense of unity and common identity among the entire noble estate. They expressed this in the phrase “noble nation” in which the concepts of nation and nobility were merged. The nation was not defined by language, religion, or subservience to the sovereign, but rather, it was defined solely by membership in the sizeable noble estate – an estate in which all members had equal rights under the law. Undoubtedly, other European nobilities also developed a sense of unity and common identity. The Polish concept of the “noble nation,” however, supposes a much stronger and more inclusive sense of corporate solidarity. Rather than pledging allegiance to the Polish King, state, or dynasty, the nobles’ first sense of loyalty allegedly went to the “noble nation.”

Many believe that it was this strong sense of brotherhood amongst the nobles – this devotion to “the noble nation” – that was the primary bond holding together the vast lands of the multinational and highly decentralized “Noble Republic.”

This article, however, challenges the view that the nobles in Poland developed a singular type of noble identity embodied in the concept of the “noble nation” or “naród szlachecki.” Amongst the strongest evidence supporting the concept of horizontal noble solidarity is precisely the contention that the nobles themselves expressed their loyalty to the noble nation. This is largely based on the existence of two phrases widely believed to be have been employed by the nobles: the “naród szlachecki,” or “noble nation,” as noted above, and the Latin “gente Ruthenus, natione Polonus.” While “noble nation” encompasses the entire nobility, the phrase “gente Ruthenus, natione Polonus” refers to the non-Polish nobles, and it implies that they felt their primary ties were to the Polish “political nation,” while deeming their Lithuanian or Ruthenian heritage of minor importance. Both terms have enjoyed highly successful careers in recent historical scholarship, and both are employed to show that the concept of the Polish nation was based not on ethnicity, but on citizenship, or rather, membership in the noble estate. The following is a revealing example of how historians employ these two phrases:

The Polish ‘noble nation’ took shape not as an ethno-linguistic nation, but as a political nation par excellence [...] ‘Being a Pole’ denoted not ethnic but political affiliation: eloquent testimony to this is provided by the phrase ‘gente Ruthenus/vel Lithuanus, natione Polonus.’

Besides demonstrating that the non-Polish nobles felt themselves to be “political Poles,” and that ethnicity mattered much less than citizenship, these two phrases play another, more important role in the above paradigm. They suggest that the Polish nobility greatly revered the idea of the nation – that it was a value they held in highest regard. Although this argument often goes unstated, the reader would infer it for two reasons. First, the self-description "gente Ruthenus, natione Polonus" represents a highly sophisticated way of expressing one's national identity. It would seem that the Lithuanian and Ruthenian nobility not only found an elegant way to assert their dual identity, but that they also were able to emphasize that their political identity held precedence over the ethnic one – all in four words. For the nobles to have achieved this degree of subtlety, unmatched in Europe until the late 19th century, one would infer that the concept of the nation must have been quite significant. Second, both phrases suggest that the nobles held a strong sense of loyalty towards "the noble nation," for it would seem that they were often making such declarations. While this might not sound unusual at first, anyone who has studied national consciousness will admit that such outright assertions of one's own national identity, or any expressed devotion to the "nation" (rather than to the usual "motherland," "country," or "king") were quite rare prior to the 19th century.

4 Other evidence consists of the Sarmatian dual-nation myth, which holds that nobles believed that only they, the nobles, descended from the ancient Sarmatians, while the rest of Poland’s inhabitants descended from the peoples the Sarmatians either conquered or later invited from other lands. For an argument showing the nobles did not include this noble/non-noble duality in their understanding of their Sarmatian heritage, see chapter 1 in DAVID ALTHOEN: That Noble Quest. From True Nobility to Enlightened Society in the Polish Lithuanian Commonwealth, 1550-1830, Ph.D. diss, University of Michigan, 2000.

5 Most historians translate this phrase to mean “a Ruthenian (Prussian, Lithuanian) by birth, but a Pole by state affiliation and political consciousness.” See for example, MARIA BOGUCKA: Dzieje kultury polskiej do 1918 roku [The History of Polish Culture until 1918], Wroclaw 1991, p. 151.

But were these terms widely used? And if so, what exactly did they mean? I argue that the nobles did not conceive of themselves in such terms, and did not have a strong concept of the nation that included all of the nobility, and only the nobility.

The Myth of the "Noble Nation"

The term "naród szlachecki," or "noble nation," has enjoyed a great career in contemporary scholarship. The success of the "noble nation" concept is due to the fact that it has served both sides of the long-standing debate over whether to view the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth in a positive or negative light. Those critical of the Commonwealth use the term to emphasize that the concept of the "noble nation" was exclusionary, that the Polish nation consisted solely of the nobility and did not include the vast majority of the population, including the Polish-speaking townspeople and peasants. Those who view the Commonwealth more favorably emphasize that the concept of the Polish nation was, for its time, quite inclusive – that the Polish "noble nation" was multinational and included all members of the Ruthenian and Polish-speaking communities.

7 It was not until Ernest Renan's pathbreaking essay: Qu'est-ce que une nation?, first delivered as a lecture at the Sorbonne in 1882, that a serious debate began in France over what exactly constituted a nation. In Poland there was a lively debate over what constituted the motherland (ojczyzna) in the early 1840s, but any discussions over the concept of "naród" and what constituted it did not come until much later.

8 The term "nation," even though often employed from the 16th century onwards, only began to have political significance in Polish writings at the end of the 18th century. It did not begin to carry the same ideological weight as "motherland," "country," or "republic" until the end of the 19th century. See chapter 3 in ALTHOEN (cf. footnote 4).

Lithuanian nobility, as well as any other members of the nobility with non-Polish roots, including Armenians, Muslim Tatars, and even Jews (after converting to Christianity). In short, historians differ over whether the designation “noble nation” depicts the glass being ten-percent-full or ninety-percent-empty. But on the fact the Poles were indeed a “noble nation,” that the idea of the nation excluded 90 percent of the population, or rather, that it included all members of a large, multi-ethnic nobility – all agree.

Indeed, in both the Polish and non-Polish secondary literature one usually finds the term “noble nation” highlighted in a way that implies it was widely used from the 16th through the 18th century. Often, historians simply offer the term itself, “naród szlachecki,” as proof that the nobility believed itself to be a political nation defined by citizen rights, and a separate nation from the non-nobles. This term appears so frequently in the secondary literature that it occupies a secure place in the Polish historian’s lexicon; no one questions whether this term was really used, or what it really meant. But a study of the etymology of “naród szlachecki” reveals that the secondary literature misrepresents both its meaning and degree of usage. Writers did not employ the term often, and when they did, they intended a very different meaning than the one supposed.

Z narodu szlacheckiego (Of Noble Parentage)

Ever since the Poles began writing extensively in Polish the term “naród” (nation) has been widely employed. In the 16th century the term “naród” was one of the two-hundred most frequently used nouns in Polish writings, and it was employed with about the same frequency as “mother,” “brother,” and “fire.” Even though it was used most often in the sense of “nation” or “people” as it is understood today, it also had other meanings that later dropped out of use. In one of those meanings “naród” could signify one’s familial origin, estate, or caste at birth. It was this meaning of familial origin or estate – and not “nation” – to which the term “naród szlachecki” always referred.

The origins of the term “naród szlachecki” do much to explain its meaning and how it was understood. The first examples of its usage are found in Polish law statutes from the middle of the 16th century. The mid-16th century was an important period in the development of Polish as a literary language. Previously, the Poles had employed Latin almost exclusively as the official language of state, and it was the sole language of their law statutes, for which they borrowed heavily from Roman terminology. In 1543, however, King Zygmunt I broke with tradition and ordered the constitutions of the Polish Sejm, the primary source of Polish law, to be written in both Polish and Latin. This created a very difficult problem for the scribes; they had to create a Polish legal language that would match the Latin terminology.\textsuperscript{15}

13 Linguists who studied over 400 16th-century texts found the following five meanings of the term “naród”: 1) Descendant, progeny (1%); 2) People, human society; person: gens, natio (vulgär) (5%); 3) Type, sort, genus (vulgär) (13%); 4) Family, familial origin, one’s estate at birth: genealogy (vulgär) (18%); 5) A community of people that is linked by cultural tradition, customs, and language, and that forms a political and economic collectivity; gens, natio (63%). See Słownik polszczyzny XVI wieku (cf. footnote 12), vol. 16, pp. 165-179.

One of their tasks was to differentiate in Polish between the Latin terms “ordo equestris/nobilis” and “nobile genus.” The term “ordo equestris,” which can be strictly translated as “the equestrian order” but meant the noble estate, was the Latin term the nobles most often used to refer to themselves.\textsuperscript{16} The equivalent Polish terms, used interchangeably, were “stan szlachecki,” “stan rycerski,” and “szlachta” (the noble estate, the knightly estate, and the nobility).\textsuperscript{17} The term “nobile genus,” on the other hand, referred to those born into the noble estate (\textit{de nobili genere}). In Polish law this distinction was quite important. One could belong to the noble estate, but not have been born into it, such as those who had been recently ennobled. Many privileges were reserved exclusively for the nobles \textit{de nobili genere} – the nobles born into the noble estate.\textsuperscript{18} Legal writers, then, had to find a way in Polish to differentiate between the broader concept of the entire noble estate (\textit{stan szlachecki}),

\textsuperscript{18} In the 14\textsuperscript{th} and 15\textsuperscript{th} centuries this distinction was made to prevent “foreigners” (those from outside the specific region) from holding positions of high influence. Later, in the 16\textsuperscript{th} and 17\textsuperscript{th} centuries, the differentiation was made between those born into the Polish noble estate from the Poles recently ennobled. which included the recently ennobled, and the narrower concept that only included nobles with noble parentage. 19

It was to fulfill this need of translating “de nobili genere” (of noble parentage) that the Polish term “naród szlachecki” was first used. The following statute, from the privileges given by King Zygmunt in 1550, illustrates how the term “naród szlachecki” was first employed and its meaning:

So that monastic investiture should be more easily preserved, we declare, in renewing the statute of 1538, that only a man of the Polish noble nation from both the side of the father and mother [jedno polskiego szlacheckiego, z ojca i z matki, narodu], and only a worthy man, should be chosen as abbot. 20

This statute makes clear that the position of abbot in a monastery was reserved exclusively for the nobles who had been born into the nobility; it could not be held by those recently ennobled. The intention was to prevent the king from placing “new people,” meaning his own people, into influential positions, and the term “naród szlachecki” was employed to make this important distinction in noble status.

Significantly, it was in this legal context – as a translation for “de nobili genere” – that the term “naród szlachecki” was primarily employed. 21 The term used for the commoners, including those not born into the nobility, was a similar variation of “naród” – the “common” or “peasant nation” (z prostego/chłopskiego narodu). 22 These terms were employed when the legal scribes needed to differentiate between the entire noble estate, including those who were nobles but had been born into the naród prosty, and those born into the nobility – those descending from noble parents – as the following example illustrates:

Since the knightly estate [stan rycerski] bears large responsibilities regarding the crown, it seems to us correct and honorable that it be privileged with separate privileges. And since it is established in the statutes of our forefathers that people of the common nation [z narodu prostego] are not to be given positions in the major churches, and that only people of the Polish noble nation and blood [ludzie narodu a krwie szlacheckiey polskiey] should be accepted, we will order the 19 Antoni Maczak notes that the term “stan” did not have a precise legal meaning in Poland and was loosely used. ANTONI MACZAK: The Structure of Power in the Commonwealth of the Sixteenth and Seventeenth Centuries, in: A Republic of Nobles. Studies in Polish History to 1864, ed. by JAN K. FEDOROWICZ, Cambridge 1982, pp. 109-135, see pp. 113-114.

21 For example, Andrzej Frycz Modrzewski, one of the few writers to use the term “naród szlachecki” outside of a legal context, was directly translating from the Latin term “nobile genus.” Słownik polszczyzny XVI wieku (cf. footnote 12), vol. 16, p. 168.
22 Researchers for the dictionary of 16th-century Polish did not find any examples of “naród mieszczański.” They did find a total of 24 examples of “naród prosty,” “naród kniecy,” and “naród chłopski” and a total of 21 examples of “naród szlachecki” and “naród rycerski.” Słownik polszczyzny XVI wieku (cf. footnote 12), vol. 16, p. 168.
chapters of cathedrals and large churches not to accept [anyone from the “common nation”] as members.

In this statute two distinctions are made regarding who is eligible to receive the highest and most distinguished ecclesiastical positions. First, one had to be “of the noble nation,” meaning born to noble parents. Second, one had to be born to parents belonging to the Polish nobility, which excluded any foreign nobles. The reference to “blood” in this case concerned adoption of men into noble families and their ancestral signs – a common method of strengthening clans and acquiring nobility in the 15th and 16th centuries. Not only did one have to have Polish noble parentage, but that parentage also had to be actual and not acquired.

An examination of the term “naród szlachecki” shows that the concepts of “the Poles” and “naród szlachecki” were far from synonymous. Those regarded as Poles could both be of noble parentage (z szlacheckiego narodu) and of common parentage (z prostego narodu), as the following privilege illustrates:

Because we are the Polish King, we do not wish to entrust any fortresses or any of the [King’s] lands to anyone, only to land-owning Poles and who are of the noble nation [jedno Polakom szlacheckiego narodu osiadłym].

This statute makes clear that only “Poles” were potential candidates for the highly desired awards of crown estates and the position of castellan. The statute, however, had to be more specific; the only Poles eligible were those who were landowners and those who were born of noble parentage.

Notably, the term “naród szlachecki” was not employed in a way that would justify its translation as “noble nation.” In the above three examples I translated “naród szlachecki” into “the noble nation” according to general practice. But it is this general practice that has led many a researcher astray. In all three cases a more accurate rendition of “naród szlachecki” would be “of noble heritage,” as shown by the concurrent Latin versions of the same statutes. In the first example, the phrase “[człowiek] jedno polskiego szlacheckiego, z ojca i z matki, narodu” was simultaneously translated as “nisi Polonici nobiles ex patre et matre generis.” In the second, the somewhat puzzling phrase “ludzie narodu a krwie szlacheckiej polskiej,” was rendered more precisely in Latin as “homines ex genere aliis ordine Nobilitatis gentis Polonicae.”

25 Even though the newly ennobled were excluded from many privileges, their descendants were not, and were considered de nobili genere – notwithstanding their ethnic, social, or religious background. See GRODZIK (cf. footnote 18), pp. 68-72, 82-95.
26 Other common translations are “nation of nobles” and “gentry nation.”
28 Ibidem, p. 176.
we would not end up with either “naród szlachecki” in Polish or “noble nation” in English. In the first case, the translation would be “[a man] of Polish noble lineage from both the mother’s and father’s side,” in the second, a literal translation would be: “men of noble heritage and estate, who are of the Polish people.” In both cases, it is the word “naród” that proves deceptive. In both cases, it did not mean “nation,” but “heritage.”

Clearly, the phrase “naród szlachecki” did not imply the idea of “nation” as understood today. In every instance that I have found the phrase “naród szlachecki” used, the word “naród” reflects one of these earlier meanings, namely a combination of “lineage,” “ancestral origins,” and “the estate one belonged to at birth.” Even in the few cases in which the term was used in non-legal texts, the meaning of the term “naród” would be best translated as “estate” or “heritage.”

In the 16th and 17th centuries, then, usage of the terms “naród szlachecki” or “naród rycerski” did not signify that only the nobility belonged to the nation. Rather, legal scribes employed the term to differentiate the nobles born into the nobility – those de nobili genere – from those nobles who were not.

“Naród szlachecki” – A Phrase Little Used

In addition to possessing a much different meaning than it does today, the term “naród szlachecki” was rarely employed. This is shown quite clearly in the monumental “Dictionary of the Polish Language in the 16th Century.” The linguists who studied the term “naród” in the over 400 texts selected for the dictionary only found rare instances in which the phrase “naród szlachecki” was actually used. In those texts, which they believed to be the most important Polish-language texts from the period – texts ranging from poetry, philosophy, and religious writings to political pamphlets, speeches, and legal codes – they found only 21 examples of either “naród szlachecki” or “naród 29 Let us examine the following example of how “noble nation” is used. In Łukasz Górnicki’s “Rozmowa Polaka z Włochem,” two speakers debate over whether the death penalty should be applied for murder. The man arguing in favor, claims that the system of paying damages would work fine for peasants, but not for the nobility: “For a man, especially one of the naród szlachecki, who is honored and worthy of admiration for his and his ancestors’ virtue, who is a worthy and necessary civis of the Republic, cannot be compensated for by any amount of gold in the world.” (Ponieważ człowiek, zwłaszcza narodu szlacheckiego, czci jest i poważenia godny i dla swej, i dla przodków swych cnoty, ponieważ godny i potrzebny Rzeczypospolitej civis, przeto płacon nie ma być żadnym na świecie złotem.) We see that by “naród szlachecki” he means “noble estate,” and by referring to the virtuous ancestors, he means a noble born into the noble estate. ŁUKASZ GÓRNICKI: ROZMOWA POLAKA Z WŁOCHEM [A Discussion Between a Pole and an Italian], in: IDEM: Pisma, ed. by ROMAN POLLAK, Warszawa 1961, vol. 2, pp. 394-395.

rycerski.” This minimal number, 21 examples, contrasts sharply with the over 4,000 examples of the term “naród” that they found and analyzed.\(^{30}\)

According to the standard paradigm, however, the concept of the “noble nation” did not fully crystallize until the last quarter of the 16th century. It is possible, then, that it was in the 17th and 18th centuries that the term became a full expression of the nobles’ national consciousness, one that signified their concept of the Polish nation as a political nation including only the noble citizens, and their sense of mutual noble solidarity. Could the phrase “naród szlachecki” have been transformed and used in the way the secondary literature suggests? Because there are no similar studies of language usage in the 17th and 18th centuries, I conducted my own textual analysis.\(^{31}\) Since my aim was to find as many examples of this phrase as possible, I chose those texts where it would be most likely employed. These texts included four of the writers that best represent the middle nobility from various periods of the 17th century (Jan Pasek, Wespazjan Kochowski, Waclaw Potocki, and Kasper Miaskowski), a collection of the political literature from the Confederacy of Bar (1768-1772), and two volumes of political writings from 1648-1664.\(^{32}\) These texts, both poetry and prose, included political tracts, aimed to influence public opinion; highly patriotic tracts, intended to rally the nobles to defend the Republic; and private works – writings that were intended only for the amusement of close friends and family, and which included epic poems, clever poetry, epigrams, and political satire. All of these works were written by the nobility for the nobility, and are widely considered to best reflect the life of the noble land-owning estate.\(^{33}\) Most importantly, these were writings

30 In the monumental dictionary of 16th-century Polish language, Słownik polszczyzny XVI wieku, we find that the term “naród szlachecki” only appears 19 times and “naród rycerski” only twice in the 400 major texts studied. Of these 21 appearances, 15 were in legal codes and statutes, which is perhaps why it seemed so pervasive to later scholars. See Słownik polszczyzny XVI wieku (cf. footnote 12), vol. 16, p. 168.

31 To date, the best study of the Polish language from this period remains that of Samuel Linde’s “Dictionary of the Polish Language” (cf. footnote 14), published in the early 19th century.

in which I originally expected to find many examples of the phrase “naród szlachecki.”

Surprisingly, in the above texts I found that the term “naród szlachecki” was only used in two cases—even though I found over 300 instances in which the term “naród” or “nation” was employed. Moreover, the term carried an identical meaning to that discussed above; in both cases, which occurred in political documents from the period of the Chmielnicki uprising, the meaning of “naród szlachecki” would have been translated as “the noble estate.” In all of my other readings, conducted less rigorously than those above, the only instances in which I found the term “naród szlachecki” employed was in several law statutes, the last dating from 1633. After that, Polish legal 34 Jan Pasek, Wespazjan Kochowski, and Waclaw Potocki are considered by literary scholars as the most “Sarmatian” of the 17th- and 18th-century writers, meaning they typified the way of thinking among the middle nobility and supposedly glorified the noble estate. Jan Pasek, considered the prime example of noble “Sarmatianism,” is known for his fascinating memoir that represents the type of spoken language employed by the middle nobles. Kochowski’s and Potocki’s works consist primarily of poetry, but also are considered typical of the nobles’ Sarmatian mentality in their glorification of the nobility and Polish megalomania. The fourth writer, Kasper Miaskowski, best represents the patriotic thought among the middle nobility at the beginning of the 17th century. The political brochures from 1648-1664 were written to sway public opinion during the period of the Chmielnicki uprising and the subsequent Swedish invasion referred to as “the deluge.” And the literature from the Confederacy of Bar, most of which circulated in manuscript, represents one of the last examples of noble ideology and political thought before the Polish Enlightenment. For an assessment of “Sarmatian writers” see TADEUSZ ULEWICZ: Zagadnienie sarmatyzmu w kulturze i literaturze polskiej. Problematyka ogólna i zarys historyczny [The Sarmatian Problem in Polish Literature and Culture. writers found other ways to differentiate between those born into the noble estate and the newly ennobled. In 1638, for example, the term "naród szlachecki" was replaced in the law statutes by the phrase "a man born into the noble estate" (człowiek w stanie szlacheckim urodzony). Moreover, the newly ennobled were signified as "the new szlachta," or, "the newly created szlachta." As to the concept of the "prosty naród," writers returned to the Latin "plebeii," as the legal writers joined the 17th-century fashion of liberally inserting Latin terms into Polish texts.

It seems, then, that the term "naród szlachecki" was rarely employed in the 17th century and soon fell into disuse as writers found other ways to differentiate between the newly ennobled and full members of the noble estate. These findings match the results of Samuel Lind's research. In his dictionary, which he meant to be a complete history of the Polish written language, he claimed (in 1810) that both the expression "naród szlachecki," and the meaning of "naród" as "stan urodzenia" (one's estate at birth) had long fallen into disuse. The most recent example he gave of this type of usage, after researching hundreds of texts, was from the early 17th century.

In other words, the term "naród szlachecki" was rarely used in the 16th, 17th, and 18th centuries, and when it was, it never carried the meaning of "noble nation." By enclosing the term "noble nation" in quotes, historians give the false impression that the nobility had a phrase that readily expressed a strong sense of corporate identity that included all of the nobility, and only the nobility, in their concept of nation. This also gives the false impression that the idea of the nation was an important ideological concept in the nobles' world-view. Clearly, the "noble nation" was not part of the nobility's vocabulary or imagination.

37 For example, Konstytucyje Seymu Warszawskiego za Władysława IV r. 1638 [The Constitutions of the Warsaw Sejm Under Władysław IV in 1638], in: Volumina Legum (cf. footnote 14), vol. 3, p. 440.

40 LINDE (cf. footnote 14), vol. 3, p. 252.
The phrase “gente Ruthenus, natione Polonus” is another term that has enjoyed a highly successful career in the secondary literature. Like “naród szlachecki,” it is employed to demonstrate that the idea of the Polish nation was based not on ethnicity, but on citizenship, or rather, membership in the noble estate. In this case the phrase refers to the non-Polish members of the nobility and ostensibly conveys their sense of national identity. It implies, according to the standard interpretation, that from the 16th century the non-Polish nobles felt their primary ties were to the Polish “political nation,” while deeming their Lithuanian or Ruthenian heritage of minor importance.

Also like the term “naród szlachecki,” the popularity of the phrase “gente Ruthenus, natione Polonus” has been due, in part, to its ability to serve multiple aims. While the implied connotation has remained the same, the arguments the phrase supports have changed over the years. From the late 19th century until 1945, historians used the phrase to demonstrate that the nobles in Eastern Galicia had long supported Poland and considered themselves Poles, and that Galicia had been always been under Polish control. After the Second World War, when the subject of Eastern Galicia was no longer open to debate, Marxist historians used the phrase in their critique of the Polish nobility. They argued that this supra-national identity prevented the Poles and the non-Polish nationalities from developing into true “modern nations” that... included all classes, thus prolonging the exploitation of the peasants.\textsuperscript{44} Recently, with Poland's current celebration of its democratic and multicultural heritage, many historians now argue that the Poles were one of the first to form an inclusive and tolerant "Western European" idea of nation. The phrase is now used to demonstrate that the nobles were citizens and patriots first; for them, the ethnic or religious background of their fellow citizens mattered little in their concept of the "Polish nation.'\textsuperscript{45}

Historians find the phrase "gente Ruthenus, natione Polonus" appealing because it serves as an elegant explanation, while at the same time providing irrefutable evidence to the argument it anchors. How can one question, for example, whether the Polish nation was based on citizenship if the Ruthenian and Lithuanian nobles really identified themselves in such a refined manner? How can one argue that the nobles did not feel a strong sense of mutual solidarity if they made a point of emphasizing that they were all "political Poles," all part of the "noble nation"? Notably, one group of scholars has experienced precisely this type of problem. In studying the Ukrainian/Ruthenian nobility, noted historians such as Frank Sysyn, David Frick, and Teresa Chynczewska-Hennel have offered compelling arguments that there was a strong and growing sense of community among the Ruthenian nobles in the first half of the 17\textsuperscript{th} century.\textsuperscript{46} This group has mounted a significant challenge to the traditional view, in both Polish and Ukrainian historiography, that the Ruthenian nobles had fully assimilated into the Polish nobility by the end of the 16\textsuperscript{th} century.\textsuperscript{47} As part of their argument they have questioned the understanding of the phrase "gente Ruthenus, natione Polonus." Instead of the traditional view, which asserts that the Ruthenian part of the moniker held little importance, both Chynczewska-Hennel and Frick claim that the Ruthenians considered the first part of the phrase, "gente Ruthenus," to be equally if not more important than the second, "natione Polonus."

\textsuperscript{44} For how the phrase was used in the period following World War II, see KACZMARCZYK, LEŚNODORSKI (cf. footnote 10), p. 80.

\textsuperscript{47} See, for example, HENRYK LITWIN: Catholicization among the Ruthenian Nobility and Assimilation Processes in the Ukraine during the Years 1569-1648, in: Acta Polonica Historica 55 (1987), pp. 57-83.
Yet, even though they disagree over the traditional meaning of "gente Ruthenus, natione Polonus," they still accept the phrase itself as an expression of the Ruthenian nobles' national consciousness. They still accept the notion that the Ruthenian nobles felt a strong sense of brotherhood with the larger "noble nation." But if the phrase did not exist, or if its meaning was entirely different from that supposed, it would then be possible to imagine the Ruthenian nobles with a significantly different sense of national community – one that did not preclude a strong sense of patriotism to the Republic, but one in which the strongest bonds were the vertical links of patronage and their ties to their own local noble communities.

So what, then, did the phrase mean exactly? Unlike the phrase "naród szlachecki," it is extremely difficult to locate any instances in which the phrase "gente Ruthenus, natione Polonus" was actually used prior to the 19th century. Few historians make any references when using the phrase. Those who do all refer to the same source, the writings of Stanisław Orzechowski. Even the most recent works that explore Ruthenian national consciousness in the late 16th and 17th centuries mention no one besides Orzechowski who used this phrase. Moreover, those who study the Lithuanian nobility claim that the nobles in the Grand Duchy of Lithuania never used it prior to the 19th century. So the question becomes intriguing: Did the non-Polish nobles use this phrase, or a variant of it, to describe themselves? And if so, what did they mean by it?

The case that the phrase was used and can be considered representative of the nobility would go as follows. First, historians consider it common knowledge that Stanisław Orzechowski used this phrase to describe himself. Second, Orzechowski’s words and opinions were highly influential; he was the best-selling writer in 16th-century Poland and was very popular amongst the nobility. Third, there is evidence that the phrase was widely used by the David Frick also notes that Orzechowski is the only one historians refer to when claiming this phrase exemplified the national consciousness of the Ruthenian nobility. Neither Sysyn nor Czech even mention the phrase in their work.

Polish nobles and the intelligentsia in the late 19th century. Hence the conclusion: Since Orzechowski’s writings were highly influential and widely read, the nobility must have widely adopted the phrase as its own and kept it in circulation until the 19th century, when there are records of it being used. The strongest argument that supports this scenario is the monumental effort required to challenge it; one would have to comb through all the writings and private correspondence of the Ruthenian and Lithuanian nobles in order to discover how (and if) it was actually employed.

There are, however, three weak links in the argument: first, that Orzechowski consistently used the phrase; second, that its meaning in the late 19th century accurately reflects how people would have understood it from the 16th to the 18th century; and third, the fact that the phrase was employed during the 19th century reflects its longtime use. Since Orzechowski is the only link to the phrase, I will analyze how and where he used the phrase, what he meant by it, and whether it was possible that others might have picked it up from his writings. I will also examine how the reader in the 16th and 17th centuries would have understood the terms “gente” (gens) and “natione” (natio).

Stanisław Orzechowski – gente Scytha, natione Ruthena

Stanisław Orzechowski was one of the more colorful characters in 16th-century Poland. He was born in 1513 to a well-situated and ambitious noble family of mixed Polish-Ruthenian parentage near Przemyśl, when Przemyśl was still considered part of Rus. Seeing that young Stanisław excelled at school, his father sent him off to study in Vienna, hoping that upon his return his gifted son would attain a high post in the Roman church and raise other family members (six brothers, five sisters) to positions of prominence.

Sixteen years later Stanisław returned as one of the most educated men in 51 For example, Tadeusz Korzon used this epithet to describe himself to his students in study groups in the 1890s. One former student remembered that Korzon proudly proclaimed that he was gente Ruthenus, natione Polonus, “which made a great impression on us Varsovians and Crownlanders.” STANISŁAW ZAKRZEWSKI: Tadeusz Korzon. Wspominanie pośmiertne [Tadeusz Korzon. Posthumous Recollections], in: IDEM: Zagadnienia historyczne (cf. footnote 43), vol. 1, pp. 247-248.

52 The best, most complete biography on Orzechowski remains Józef Ossoliński’s literary history, of which he dedicated the entire third volume to Orzechowski and his writings. See JóZEF M. OSSOLIŃSKI: Wiadomości historyczno-krytyczne do dziejów literatury polskiej, o pisarzach polskich, także postronnych, którzy w Polsce albo o Polsce pisali oraz o ich dziełach, z rozstrzygnięciem wzrostu i różny kolej ogólnego oświecienia, jako też szczegółowych nauk w Narodzie Polskim [Historical and Critical Information on the History of Polish Literature, about Polish Writers, even Foreigners, who Wrote in Poland or about Poland, and also about their Works, with a Discussion on the Growth and Various Vicissitudes of General Enlightenment and also Specific Branches of Learning in the Polish Nation], vol. 3, Kraków 1822, pt. 1-2.
Poland. Although Orzechowski began a brilliant literary career and quickly moved up the Church hierarchy, he was not a model priest. Always against the Church's requirement of celibacy, Orzechowski openly challenged it, both by word and by deed. Although Orzechowski had many "places to lie down," openly visited them, and refused to say mass, he did not get into difficulties until he decided to cease his immoral life and take a wife. This the Church could not tolerate. Even though Orzechowski renounced his priestly vows, the Church excommunicated him, annulled his marriage, and ordered the seizure of his property. Orzechowski soon became a cause celebre among the Polish nobility and his case was even brought up in the Polish Sejm. The nobility defended Orzechowski's rights as a noble and prevented the Church from seizing his land. Orzechowski furthered his cause by writing many caustic pamphlets against the Church. Upon recognizing his power with the pen, Church authorities decided to call back Orzechowski to the fold so as to have his pointed quill aimed at the Church's enemies. Orzechowski was reinstated in his former position of canon of Przemyśl, but the Church never acknowledged his marriage.

But more than his personal life, it was Orzechowski's writings that made him well known, both at home and abroad. Even though he has not attracted much interest of late, Orzechowski's contemporaries considered him Poland's top writer and orator - "il primo letterato" of Poland. In his most popular political pamphlet he bluntly told the King that it was his job to serve the kingdom, and not the other way around. He also shrewdly criticized the magnates' abuse of power. Many historians argue that Orzechowski had more influence over the nobility's way of thinking than did anyone else during the 16th century. He certainly was Poland's most published and widely read author during his lifetime and for a good time afterward. Also a charismatic

54 This is how the papal envoy to Poland, Bernardo Bongiovanni, described Orzechowski in a letter (Cracow, 20 April 1561), in: Elementa ad fontium editiones, vol. 58, ed. by CAROLINA LANCKORANSKA, Rome 1984, p. 6.

55 Orzechowski's degree of influence is often lamented today by Polish historians. Many feel that Orzechowski's writings played a large part in Poland's turn away from European humanism into its self-absorbed Sarmatism, and some go as far as to claim that his writings led to the downfall of Poland. See, for example, ANDRZEJ WYCZAŃSKI: Polska Rzeczã Pospolita szlachecka [Poland, the Noble Republic], 2nd ed. Warszawa 1991, p. 275; MACiszewski (cf. footnote 42), pp. 131-133; GRZYBOWSKl (cf. footnote 11), p. 69. For a different interpretation of Orzechowski's writings, see ALTHOEN (cf. footnote 4), pp. 248-261, 594-604.

56 Jan Kochanowski's number of publications did not surpass Orzechowski until the early 17th century. Other writers who today attract more scholarly interest, such as Górnicki, Rej, and Frycz-Modrzewski, did not come close to the number of works published (and subsequent editions) of Orzechowski. *Bibliografia literatury polskiej. speaker, Orzechowski had the type of rambunctious personality that made him a popular figure among the nobility. In other words, if Orzechowski did use the phrase “gente Ruthenus, natione Polonus” often, consistently, and imparted the meaning we suppose, perhaps we could accept that this type of national identification was representative of the nobility— even if we (eventually) find only a few cases of it actually being used in the three-hundred year period following his death.

He did not, however, use the phrase often or consistently. Of those who attribute the expression “gente Ruthenus, natione Polonus” to Orzechowski, no one actually mentions where in his writings the phrase can be found. In those of Orzechowski’s texts available to me—I have looked through nearly everything that has been published over the last 200 years—I have yet to locate it. There were, however, many other ways in which Orzechowski described his national affiliation. Since many argue that the manner in which Orzechowski expressed his national identity heavily influenced the non-Polish nobles, it would be worth examining the terms he actually used.

57 Symmons-Symonolewicz is the exception. Even though he attributes the phrase to Orzechowski, he notes that he himself also could not find it. See IDEM (cf. footnote 42), p. 39.

While I have not yet found the exact phrase, I have found interesting variations. One example is the case in which Orzechowski described himself as gente Scytha, natione Ruthena. In his famous letter to the Pope, in which Orzechowski argued against the Church’s rule of celibacy for priests (just after his marriage and subsequent excommunication), Orzechowski gave the following autobiographical details:

> I am of the Scythian people and of the Ruthenian nation [gente Scytha, natione Ruthena]. But in a certain way I am of the Sarmatian [nation], for Rus, which is my patria, is located in European Sarmatia. To the right [of Rus] there is Dacia, and to the left is Poland. Before [Rus] is Hungary, and indeed behind it is Scythia that turns towards the rising sun. This natio [the Ruthenians] follows the religion of the Greek rite and has believed in Christ for more than six hundred years.\(^59\)

Orzechowski also used an interesting variation of our phrase in describing the Poles, claiming the Poles in general are natione Slavos, gente vero Graecos (literally: “Slavs by natio, but also Greeks by gens”).\(^60\) He also described himself thus: “I am a Roxolanian noble under the rule of the Polish king, born and acknowledged by a Greek mother and Latin father.”\(^61\) And similarly: “I was born in Rus – a Roxolanian on the part of my mother, but a Latin regarding the faith practiced by my father.”\(^62\) Other self descriptions include “I am an Oriental, a Greek born of Greeks,” and a referral to himself as "a Barbarian, a Sarmatian, and a Ruthenian." Among these many ways of describing himself, there was one that came very close to "gentle Ruthenus, natione Polonus." In the titles of two of his lesser theological tracts Orzechowski did add appellation "gentle Roxolanius, natione vero Polonus" after his name. Orzechowski often used the terms "Roxolanian" and "Ruthenian" interchangeably, believing the Ruthenians to be direct descendants of the Roxolians. It is highly likely, then, that these two references are the source that inspired later historians to attach the moniker of "gentle Ruthenus, natione Polonus" to Orzechowski.

In other words, it is very likely that Orzechowski never used the phrase "gentle Ruthenus, natione Polonus." And if Orzechowski did use the phrase, it certainly was not in any writings that reached a wide audience. He did twice use the moniker "gentle Roxolanius, natione vero Polonus," but this occurred in titles of obscure religious tracts, and it certainly was not representative of the ways in which he described his national identity. Further examination of the terms Orzechowski used and their meanings will further clarify the latter point.

Orzechowski – a Polonized Ukrainian or a Ukrainianized Pole?

The fact that Orzechowski described himself as gentle Scytha, natione Ruthena, and then "gentle Roxolanius, natione Polonus" did not mean he didn’t know who he was. This seemingly bizarre national identity was due to Orzechowski’s fascination with ethnogenises – quite common among intellectuals 63 Stanisław Orzechowski to Ioanni Zaleski, Żurawica, 1547, ibidem, p. 59. Notably, Orzechowski here states that it is largely because he is a Greek (of the Orthodox faith) that he disagrees with the rule of celibacy: "I answered him, in fact, that I am an Oriental, a Greek born of Greeks, and I do not feel restricted by this corruptible norm of the Occidentals, thanks to which the Roman Church has achieved for itself an appalling reputation." The second is from Stanisław Orichovii ad Nicolaum Brudzovium Palatinum Lanciensem, ibidem, p. 204.

64 One brochure was entitled "Pro dignitate sacerdotali oratio Stanislai Orichovii gente Roxolani, natione vero Poloni." This was published twice, once in Poland and once abroad: Cracow, 1561 and Cologne, 1563. Also, there was a very similar brochure published the same year: Eodem anno Orichovius orationem, quam in Varsaviensi synode 1561 Mart. 13 habitit, typis edidit, s.t. Stanislai Orichovii gente Roxolani, natione vero Poloni in Varsaviensi Synodo Provinciae Poloniae pro dignitate sacerdotiali oratio (Cracow, 1561). See ibidem, pp. 515, 521.

65 Tadeusz Sinko also suggests that this was indeed the source of Orzechowski’s famous self-description. Sinko (cf. footnote 53), p. 102.

66 In spite of his popularity in the 16th century, only two of his works were read during the 17th and first half of the 18th century: "Fidelis Subditus" and "Annales Polonicæ." See Bogumila Kosmanowa: Popularność Stanisława Orzechowskiego w Rzeczypospolitej szlacheckiej [The Popularity of Stanisław Orzechowski in the Noble Republic], in: Odrodzenie i Reformacja w Polsce 22 (1977), pp. 75-91; Bibliografia literatury polskiej (cf. footnote 56), pp. 48-52.
in the 16th century – and reflected his changing ideas regarding the origins of the Poles and Ruthenians. In most cases Orzechowski described himself simply as a Ruthenian. Usually he signed his name as “Stanislaus Orichovius Rutenus,” or “Roxolanus” and often referred to himself as such – both in the titles of his published works and in the actual text. In the beginning of one of his most popular political tracts, he claimed: “Ruthenum me esse et glorior et libenter profiteor” (I am proud to be Ruthenian and willingly proclaim it.). Orzechowski also claimed Rus as his patria, and willingly spoke of his attachment to Rus in his correspondence with foreigners.

In addition to often underlining his Ruthenian identity, Orzechowski also referred to himself as a Pole, and spoke of his love for Poland: “Poland, my sweetest patria.” Although the instances he openly declared himself a Pole are rare, unlike his frequent referral to his Ruthenian origins, there is much evidence in his writings that he also considered himself a Pole and part of the naród polski. In the introduction to one of his political tracts, for example, he stated that he, a Pole, wrote it in Polish for Poles, “Polak Polakiem pisal,” so that foreigners such as the Germans or Italians would not read it. There were two common situations in which Orzechowski underlined his Polishness: when he was abroad (very little was known of Rus), and when he was trying to defend the interests of the Ruthenian landowners.
ing case, however, Orzechowski did state he was a Pole while defending the honor of the Polish nobility.\textsuperscript{74} Clearly, Orzechowski did feel himself to be both a Pole and a Ruthenian.

One cannot assume, however, that Orzechowski's expressions of Polishness signified an identity as a "political Pole," or a strong sense of unity with the "noble nation."\textsuperscript{75} Orzechowski's special links to Poland, his feelings of being a Polish noble, stemmed primarily from the origins of Oksza, his ancestral emblem. In his autobiography he proudly spoke of his ancestors, Polish knights of the Oksza clan, who came to Rus in the early 15\textsuperscript{th} century and settled in the village Orzechowce.\textsuperscript{76} Orzechowski claims these knights married Ruthenian women, and it was the Ruthenian knights who named his family "Orzechowski." Thereafter, this new Orzechowski clan quickly integrated in the Ruthenian community. Orzechowski's own mother came from the Ruthenian nobility and her father was an Orthodox priest.\textsuperscript{77} Therefore, as Orzechowski himself often pointed out, almost all of Orzechowski's ancestors, those who made up the Orzechowski clan, were Ruthenians. But, the Orzechowski clan was also strongly linked to the Polish nobility. The Orzechowskis, even though they had their origins in Rus and were part of the Ruthenian nobility, were also one of the families linked to the Oksza emblem, and thus part of a larger Polish clan.

It is in this light that Orzechowski's most revealing statement regarding his origins can be analyzed. In "Chimera," one of his religious tracts attacking the Protestants, he claimed "me Polonia genuit [...] Russia dulcis aluit" (Poland gave birth to me [...] Rus sweetly nourished/raised me.).\textsuperscript{78} In this statement Orzechowski was not referring to himself, but to the Orzechowski ród. As to the first part, he was claiming that Poland gave birth to his family's noble heritage. His ancestral crest, he claimed, "was born in true Polish..."
blood,” and his ancestors who earned the crest were common people, “as all true Polish nobles once were,” and had proved their nobility through “their love for the Polish people.” As to the second part, “Rus sweetly nourished me,” Orzechowski was referring to the fact that the Orzechowski clan, even though its founders were Poles, had developed and flourished entirely in Rus, intermarrying primarily with Ruthenian families. Orzechowski could, then, and did consider himself a Pole (rodem z Polski) when speaking of the larger clan associated with Oksza, his ancestral emblem, and a Ruthenian (rodem z Rusi), when speaking of the Orzechowski clan.

The genuinely interesting question concerning Orzechowski is not that of his national identity, but rather, why he underlined it so often. Orzechowski was unusual in the 16th century precisely because he often did stress his national identity. If scholars look to him for examples of national consciousness, it is only because few others felt the need to state who they were in such detail. There are two theories concerning Orzechowski’s motives behind his national declarations. According to some, it was Orzechowski’s strong Ruthenian patriotism that triggered his many declarations of Ruthenian identity. Others, who claim him as a Pole, say that he was trying to accustom both the Polish and Ruthenian nobles to the idea that they all belonged to one Polish nation. I would argue that these were questions that concerned him little. The issue that concerned him most, a matter upon which all scholars agree, was the Church’s prohibition of marriage for priests. The question of 79 Linde’s dictionary shows that the origins of one’s clan, or ród, was one of the ways national affiliation was determined. For “Pole” he had two definitions: one born in Poland (urodzony w Polsce), and one whose clan originated in Poland (rodem z Polski). As to what “Poland” was, Linde emphasized the core territories of the Poles (Wielkopolska and Małopolska). He also defined “Lithuanian” as one whose clan originates in Lithuania (rodem z Litwy). See Linde (cf. footnote 14), vol. 2, p. 1086 (“Korofczyk”), p. 1281 (“Litwa/Litwin”); vol. 4, p. 869 (“Polak”), p. 886 (“Polska”).

82 Orzechowski’s feeling of patriotism did not extend to all of Rus. He was loyal, first of all, to his own Przemysł region (he called it his patria), and then to the part of Rus annexed to Poland in the 14th century, now referred to as Ukrainian Galicia. In this Orzechowski was typical of the Ruthenian nobles in the mid-16th century who felt strong ties to their own regions, but did not have a strong sense of belonging to a larger Rus collective. See Sysyn: Ukrainian-Polish relations (cf. footnote 46), p. 67.
celibacy, and its direct relation to the fate of his children and descendants, is the key to understanding Orzechowski’s many declarations of national identity.

As noted above, Orzechowski had long opposed the Roman Church’s requirement of celibacy for priests. On this issue Orzechowski claimed to agree fully with Martin Luther. Orzechowski, in fact, knew Luther’s arguments well; he had studied under Luther and had temporarily left the Catholic Church. But amongst the Catholic hierarchy he found it wise to not employ the arguments associated with Luther. Instead, he argued against celibacy by pointing out the examples of the Orthodox and Armenian priests, examples he knew extremely well. His native Rus was populated primarily by people of the Orthodox faith, and it also had a significant Armenian minority in its towns. Moreover, his own maternal grandfather was an Orthodox priest. After returning to Poland, Orzechowski continued to argue against celibacy and continued to invoke the examples of the Orthodox priests.

After Orzechowski married, the issue of celibacy became for him much more than a favorite cause. The question of celibacy gravely overshadowed his familial standing and the future of his descendants. Even though the Church did revoke his excommunication and allowed him to return to his former position of canon, it never acknowledged his marriage. This was quite a serious matter. An unacknowledged marriage meant that Orzechowski’s five children were born out of wedlock and therefore were not considered part of the noble estate and had no rights of inheritance. Of course, powerful protectors could have prevented Orzechowski and his descendants from being challenged on this issue, but he always had reason to worry. In his last years he made great efforts to persuade the Church to acknowledge the marriage.
His strategy was clear. He used every occasion to remind all within the Catholic Church that he was a Ruthenian, from a people who were Christian, Greek Christian, but whose priests were allowed to marry. Thus, in reminding all that he was a Ruthenian, Orzechowski was also making his case amongst the nobility that his children were the children of a valid marriage, and thus should be considered members of the noble estate. Although the Church never formerly acknowledged the marriage, it seems that “Orzechow-85 On this issue the Polish nobles were strict. Even if a man married his concubine and acknowledged the children they had together, the children born before the marriage would not be considered nobles and would not be able to obtain inheritance. HENRYK ski Rutenus” was ultimately successful in convincing the nobles of the validity of his marriage and that his children and descendants should receive the privileges of nobility. His many reminders of his Ruthenian heritage served his prodigy well.

Stanislaw Orzechowski, then, claimed to be both a Ruthenian and a Pole, although his assertions of Ruthenian identity were much more numerous. This type of dual identity was nothing unusual, due to the very fluid meanings that the terms “Ruthenian” and “Pole” encompassed at the time. In Orzechowski’s case, however, his dual identity can be traced to the origins of his two clans—the clan of his family name, whose origins were in Rus, and the larger clan of his heraldic emblem, whose origins were in Poland. In this sense he was both “rodem z Rusi” and “rodem z Polski,” and he claimed both Rus and Poland as his country of ancestral origin. His many assertions of national identity, however, do not mean that the concept of nation carried great significance. Orzechowski employed his Ruthenian heritage first as an inoffensive argument against celibacy. Once he was personally affected, and the fate of his family rested in the balance, Orzechowski made every attempt to emphasize his Ruthenian background, both before the ecclesiastical authorities and his fellow nobles, who were well aware that there was nothing unusual about Ruthenian priests who married. Even though I argue that Orzechowski’s many declarations of national identity were primarily motivated by his fervor in the debate over celibacy for Catholic priests, I do not claim this to be his sole motivation. Certainly, Orzechowski was also a patriot, and in his writings he expressed strong feelings of attachment to both his native Rus and the Polish Kingdom. My point, and it is a fine one, is that the concept of “nation” for Orzechowski held little significance (unlike the concepts of “patria,” “Respublica,” “Poland,” and “Rus”). For Orzechowski, the ród, or clan, held much greater importance than the naród, or nation.

The Difference Between Gens and Natio

I argued above that Orzechowski did not use the phrase “gente Ruthenus, natione Polonus” often or consistently, and that if he did use it, it certainly was not in his writings that reached a wide audience. But in the event someone eventually discovers that “gente Ruthenus, natione Polonus” was indeed employed, the meaning of the phrase itself should be scrutinized. By examining the meanings of the terms “gens” and “natio” in the 16th, 17th, and 18th centuries, I determine how the phrase might have been interpreted, and how it certainly would not have.

87 Orzechowski’s son Jędrzej was a rotmistrz (cavalry captain) in the military, enjoyed a brilliant career at the court of Jan Tarnowski, and then received a starostwo. Ossoliński (cf. footnote 52), vol. 3, pt. 1, p. 159.
The current understanding of the expression "gente Ruthenus" is still largely based on Stanisław Kot’s analysis of the difference between the terms “gens” and “natio.” Kot defined “gens” as a group bonded by a shared ancestry and language, but one whose members are largely unaware of the group’s existence.\(^88\) As to “natio,” Kot claimed it to be a “higher” form of national identity than “gens,” one that could include the inhabitants of one state whose primary bonds were a common national consciousness, a common national heritage, and common national goals— but not necessarily a common language or ethnic lineage.\(^89\) In other words, Kot claimed that “gens” referred to the ethnic group, and “natio” referred to the political nation. Based on this explanation, most scholars emphasize that “natio Polonus” is the more important part of the phrase—the “higher” form of group identity.\(^90\) The Ukrainian camp notwithstanding, scholars see this phrase as evidence that the Ruthenian and Lithuanian nobles believed themselves to be Poles of Ruthenian or Lithuanian heritage, but Poles first and foremost. The translation of “gente Ruthenus, natione Polonus” is often presented in this way: “a Ruthenian (Prussian, Lithuanian) by birth, but a Pole by state affiliation and political consciousness.”\(^91\)

In the Latin lexicon, however, this difference between the terms “natio” and “gens” did not exist.\(^92\) Ever since the two terms began to take on the general meaning of “nation” during Romans times, they have been almost identical in meaning. The origins of the terms help clarify the early subtle difference in their meanings. The term “gens,” for example, originally meant “clan,” but soon expanded to include such meanings as “family,” “descendants,” and also “race,” “nation,” and “people.” During the height of the Roman empire, the term “gens” was mainly used in the plural in its meaning of “nations” or “peoples” and primarily signified any foreign peoples—in opposition to the populus Romanus.\(^93\) The term “natio” had similar origins. In

\(^92\) The two words were not synonyms in all their meanings. I am only referring to the most widely understood meaning of both words, i.e. “ethnic group, nation, people.”

\(^93\) Then, with the expansion of Christianity, the term “gens” became employed in the official language of the Roman Church. There it was often employed as the correspondent of the Greek “patiens” and signified the peoples who were not Jews or the very early Roman period it meant “birth,” and in the common language it came to mean “litter” when referring to a brood of animals born to the same mother. It was in this sense that it expanded to its meaning close to “nation,” signifying those individuals born in the same place with a common ancestor.
By the 1st century AD the meaning of “natio” had become very similar to that of “gens.” In the language of the Roman Church the term “nationes” served, as did “gentes,” to translate “the pagan nations,” in opposition to the “people of God.”
In other words, even in the Late Roman period there was no strong pronounced difference between “natio” and “gens.” By the 8th century Isidor of Seville’s influential “Etymologie” was claiming that “natio” and “gens” were synonyms. This merging of meaning continued well into the early modern period; the dictionaries from the 16th century underlined little difference between the two terms.

“Natio,” then, did not carry the “higher” meaning of “political nation,” or “community of citizens.” In fact, an examination of the subtle differences between “gens” and “natio” shows that “natio” carried the more narrow, restrictive meaning – closer to the meaning of “tribe.” “Natio” referred to a nation or people who traced their descent to one ancestor, and who lived on the land where their mythological origins began, while “gens” referred to the larger sense of “people” or “nation” – independent of homeland or common ancestor.
Tacitus and Cicero, two of Poland’s most widely read writers, made this subtle differentiation. As Benedykt Zientara points out, Tacitus spoke of all of the Germans as one gens, and then broke them up into their various nationes, and Cicero chose the term “natio” when emphasizing common descent. As one medieval Latin grammar explained, in noting the terms’ subtle differences, “the natio descends from one father, the gens

John Rider’s “Bibliotheca Scholastica” from 1589, for example, claimed both terms, “natio” and “gens,” could serve as the translation for the English “nation.” JOHN RIDER: Bibliotheca Scholastica, Menston 1970 (facsimile reprint from 1589), p. 984. Moreover, both terms could serve as the translation for the English term “people.” THOMAS COOPER: Thesaurus Linguae Romanae et Britannicae, Menston 1969 (facsimile reprint from 1565), under listing for “natio.”
A subtle difference between the two terms is found in Thomas Cooper’s “Thesaurus Linguae Romanae et Britannicae” from 1565. Cooper defines “natio” as “a nation: a people having their beginning in the country where they dwell.” He defines “gens” as “a nation: a people: sometimes a kindred.” COOPER (cf. footnote 96) – under listings for “natio” and “gens.”
describes a large grouping.” In other words, the natio could form part of the gens, which signified a whole people – a people with a common language or geographical base. Indeed, it was the term “gens” that usually referred to “nations” in the larger political sense. The expression “the law of nations,” for example, was universally known as “ius gentium,” and not “ius nationum.”

By no means, however, did all writers understand such a difference or consistently maintain clarity in their terminology. The linguists who have studied the two terms claim that the main difference between the two was that most writers simply preferred “gens” to “natio.” Language, for example, was the most important distinguishing factor between both terms; according to general usage it was primarily language that differentiated one natio from another natio, and one gens from another gens. Moreover, there was no hierarchy understood when the terms “natio” and “gens” were used together; rather, the terms were usually used together for the rhetorical effect. The loose emblematic phrase “peoples and nations,” often used in 19th-century political oratory – “the many peoples and nations of the world” – most likely stems from the popular Latin phrase, “gentes atque nationes,” which was just as redundant in Latin as it is in English.

In sum, when “gens” and “natio” were employed together the term “natio” did not signify an elevated form of identity with the state or political nation. From the middle ages through the 18th century the two terms were largely synonymous: both could serve equally well as translations for “people” and “nation,” and for both terms language was the most significant distinguishing factor. If there was a subtle difference intended, it would have been the term “natio” that was more restrictive: in these cases “gens” referred to a larger 101 In the language of the Roman Church and in poetry writers often found it easier to fit “gens” into the meter. Ibidem, p. 1843 (lines 55-65).

102 One dictionary from the middle ages claimed that the difference between “natio” and “patria” was that one’s natio was determined by language and familial origins (gens), while one’s patria was determined by one’s place of origin. Novum glossarium mediae Latinitatis ab anno DCCC usque ad annum MCC, ed. by FRANZ BLATT, Hafniae 1957-1998, vol. 8, 1969, pp. 1081-1082. See also ZIENIARA: Populus – gens – natio (cf. footnote 95), pp. 678-680.

103 Emanuela Sgambati, for example, argues that because Orzechowski often juxtaposed the two terms in phrases such as “gentes atque nationes” (peoples and nations), he clearly intended different meanings for them. SGAMBATI (cf. footnote 10), p. 100. But linguists ALFRED ERNOUT and ANTOINE MEILLET (cf. footnote 93) disagree, p. 430.

grouping, based on a common language or shared territory, and “natio” referred to a smaller group within the “gens,” which traced its descent to a common ancestor.

A Ruthenian by Nationality, but also a Pole by Descent

So what did Orzechowski mean, when he added the appellation “gente Roxolanus, natione vero Polonus” after his name? Although he only used it in the titles of two religious tracts meant for a narrow audience, Orzechowski was conveying information about himself that he thought important. An examination of Orzechowski’s writings shows that the discussion above also applied to his usage of “gens” and “natio,” the only significant difference between the two terms was that he clearly preferred “gens.”105 The term “natio” certainly did not carry the meaning of “political nation” in his writings; Orzechowski described the Poles, for example, as natione Slavi, gente vero Graeci.106 And Orzechowski was not the only Polish writer to employ the terms “natio” and “gens” interchangeably; other Polish writers also used them as synonyms.107

But clearly, Orzechowski meant something by the phrase “gente Roxolanus, natione vero Polonus.” The meaning of the first part, “gente Roxolanus,” is clear. Orzechowski used the terms “Roxolanus” and “Ruthenus” often and interchangeably; in both the titles of his works and when signing letters he most often referred to himself as “Stanislaus Orichovius Ruthenus” or “Stanislaus Orichovius Roxolanus.” Moreover, he often expressed his strong ties to Rus and his Ruthenian identity: “I am proud to be Ruthenian and willingly proclaim it.” It is the second part of the phrase, “natione vero Polonus,” upon which the whole argument that Orzechowski classified himself as a “political Pole” hinges. As noted above, the term “natio” could carry a subtle sense of place and descent that “gens” did not have. In medieval Poland, the term “natio” in the genitive, as Orzechowski

105 See ALTHOEN (cf. footnote 4), pp. 141-145.
107 This is seen quite clearly in Maciej Kazimierz Sarbiewski’s “Descriptio gentium” in which the genera he describes are the Spaniards, French, Poles, Italians, and Germans. Yet, in a similar text Sarbiewski refers these same peoples as nationes. STANISŁAW KOT: Descriptio gentium di poeti polacchi del secolo XVII, in: Ricerche Slavistiche 6 (1958), pp. 154-159 and 164. Moreover, linguists who studied the medieval Latin texts written in Poland claim both terms carried the meaning of “people” (lud) and “nation” (naród). Słownik łaciiny średniowiecznej w Polsce [The Dictionary of Latin in Poland in the Middle Ages], ed. by MARIAN PLEZIA, Wrocław 1953-present, vol. 4, pp. 516-517, and vol. 6, p. 604.
employed it, could mean “rodem z” (“by birth” or “by descent”). Consequently, “natione Polonus” could have meant “rodem z Polski,” or “a Pole by birth or descent.” And Orzechowski, as he clearly stated numerous times, did consider himself a Pole by descent — due to his ancestral crest, Oksza. Therefore, Orzechowski’s moniker, “gente Roxolanus, natione vero Polonus,” could very well be translated as follows: “Stanisław Orzechowski, a Ruthenian by nationality, but also a Pole by descent.”

Gente Ruthenus/Lithuanus, Natione Polonus — a 19th-Century Phrase

I have argued above that the exact phrase “gente Ruthenus, natione Polonus” was most likely never used prior to the 19th century. I also argued that even if someone discovers a similar type of phrase in use prior to the 19th century, it would not necessarily imply that the non-Polish nobles held a strong political sense of the nation, while deeming their ethnic heritage of minor importance. Yet, one question remains. From where did the phrase originate, if not from Orzechowski? How did it become a widely accepted expression of national identity in the late 19th century if it had not been passed down from generation to generation. After all, many late 19th-century historians, including Mykhailo Hrushevs’kyi, were convinced that this phrase had typified Ruthenian and Lithuanian noble consciousness for centuries.

Interest in Orzechowski began in the late 18th century, when Polish writers looked to Orzechowski’s Polish writings as a model for political discourse and polemics. The Galician nobles became especially interested in Orzechowski following Józef Ossoliński’s publication in 1822 of a two-volume book on Orzechowski that included a great deal of his writings and letters. The Galicians found this book fascinating because it was one of the first that offered an extensive look into the history of the Galician Ruthenian nobility and Galicia itself. In this work Ossoliński included many of Orzechowski’s own expressions of national identity, including his statement that he was a Ruthenian and a Polish szlachcic: “Do you know who I am? I am Orzechowski, an honest Ruthenian, a Przemyśl, a Polish noble of the

109 Or, perhaps a better, less literal translation: “Stanisław Orzechowski, of the Ruthenian people, but also of Polish descent.”
111 See appendix C in ALTHOEN (cf. footnote 4), pp. 611-612.
112 This work remains the most extensive account on Orzechowski’s life and writings. On Orzechowski’s popularity, see BOGUMILA KOSMANOWA: Recepcja twórczości Stanisława Orzechowskiego od połowy XVIII do połowy XIX wieku [The Reception of the Works of Stanisław Orzechowski from the Mid-18th Century to the Mid-19th Century], in: Pamiętnik Biblioteki Kórnickiej 13 (1977), pp. 76-77.
Ossoliński also listed the two titles of Orzechowski’s religious tracts in which he added the appellation “gente Roxolani, natione vero Poloni” after his name. Most likely it was from this book that the nobles first borrowed and adapted the phrase to describe their national identity. This type of identification would have been popular among the nobles who became interested in their Ruthenian roots and Ruthenian folklore in the 1830s. Then, when the Ukrainian question became politicized in 1848, the expression proved very useful. At that time the Austrian Government attempted to split Galicia into two, by setting up a Ruthenian council in Eastern Galicia to counter the influence of the Polish nobility. The Polish landowners of Eastern Galicia then set up a competing Ruski Sobor for which Ruthenian descent was a prerequisite – all nobles claimed to be Ruthenians in their attempt to win the Ruthenians over their side for the idea of a unified Galicia, and of the Polish ojczyzna. Some of the aristocrats did in fact use the phrase “gente Ruthenus, natione Polonus” at this meeting, when claiming their Ruthenian descent.

With 1848 marking the beginning of a strong Ruthenian, and then Ukrainian movement, the phrase “gente Ruthenus, natione Polonus” quickly took a life of its own. By the late 19th century the nobles of both Ruthenian and Lithuanian descent found this phrase a useful way to state their attachment to their ethnic heritage along with their support of Polish culture and a Polish state that would encompass all of its former territories. Therefore, 118 One of the earliest examples showing the significance of the phrase in the national discourse comes from Ludwig Kubala’s popular book on Orzechowski, first published in 1870: “[Orzechowski] was the first that placed the relationship of both nationalities in such an appropriate manner, well fitted to his doctrine and convictions. He was the first to sign his works ‘Orzechowski Rusin’ and left his appellation _gente Ruthenus, natione Polonus_ to tradition. He gave the wisest council to the Church regarding its the phrase “gente Ruthenus/Lithuanus, natione Polonus” reflects how some Ruthenian and Lithuanian nobles viewed their national identity in the second half of the 19th century – when national identity became politicized – and not before.

Conclusion

The concept of the “noble nation” is largely based on the existence and widespread use of two expressions – the “naród szlachecki” itself and the Latin phrase “gente Ruthenus/Lithuanus, natione Polonus.” I argue, in short, that neither of these was employed in the way scholars suggest; neither supports the idea that the nobles maintained a political concept of the nation, one that included all members of the noble estate, and only the noble estate. The phrase “naród szlachecki” never meant “noble nation” in the 16th and 17th centuries. Rather, it should be translated as “of noble parentage” when used in the singular genitive, as it usually was, and as “noble estate” when employed otherwise. Moreover, the phrase “naród szlachecki” was rarely used from the mid-16th century through the mid-17th century, after which it fell into disuse. As to the phrase “gente Ruthenus,” it does not represent any form of self-identity that existed prior to the second half of the 19th century. Traced back to Stanislaw Orzechowski, one can find something equivalent to this phrase in two of his more obscure publications. This phrase was not, however, representative of how he described himself, nor did he use this phrase in any of his writings that were meant for the noble readership. Moreover, the standard interpretation of the phrase is based on a false understanding of the meanings of “gens” and “natio.” Both terms were largely synonyms, and were usually used interchangeably. In the case of Orzechowski’s twice-used moniker “gente Roxolanus, natione vero Polonus,” I argued that it should be translated as “a Ruthenian by nationality, but also a Pole by descent.”

Acceptance of the above arguments does not mean that the characterization of the Commonwealth as a largely tolerant polity must also be discarded. We can look to the period preceding the 19th century to demonstrate that Polish identity was not always tightly constricted and ethnically exclusive. Poland does have a heritage of being open and inclusive, and during the period of the Commonwealth it seems clear that nationality and ethnicity carried little political significance – especially in comparison to the virulent Polish nationalism of the early 20th century. If this is the point scholars wish to make, it is not difficult to find convincing evidence elsewhere.

119 See, for example, ALTHOEN (cf. footnote 4), chapter 3.
The implications of this article, as I see it, are two fold. First, it helps show that the idea of the nation did not have much political significance in the 16th and 17th centuries. The nobles did not use such terms as “noble nation” and did not profess loyalty to the idea of the nation.

Stanisław Orzechowski’s many declarations of his national identity do not signify that the concept of the nation held for him great significance. Many of his declarations of identity were motivated by his apprehension regarding the legality of his marriage and the subsequent problem of ensuring that his children’s and descendants’ nobility would be uncontested following his death. Or, in other words, it was his ród that held his primary concern, not his naród. Orzechowski is interesting precisely because his writings can be used to demonstrate that the ideas of the nation were quite fluid in the 16th century, and that one could have multiple identities. Orzechowski, however, cannot be used to demonstrate the existence of the “political Pole,” as his ties to Poland and the Polish nation were more than just political; more importantly, they extended through his ancestral crest and the original founders of the Orzechowski clan. As to the usage of the term “political Pole,” I would argue that it should be only employed to emphasize common loyalty to the patria, the Republic, or Poland in general – not to any form of “nation.”

Second, my arguments in this essay suggest that the sense of unity among the noble estate was not as strong as most scholars suggest. The fact that the nobles did not use such phrases as “naród szlachecki” and “gente Ruthenus” may allow scholars to envision Polish political culture in a slightly different light. My argument does not go so far as to say there was no sense of community among the nobles. In this regard I agree with Frank Sysyn, who, while challenging many of the orthodoxies regarding the Poland-Lithuania Commonwealth, concedes that there was indeed something that united the nobility of the Commonwealth: a sense of obligation to defend the motherland, a desire to defend noble privileges, a sense of belonging to the same republic, and, for many, a desire to defend the Catholic faith. My argument, however, is that these types of bonds were very different from the concept of the “noble nation,” in which thenobles felt a strong sense of brotherhood amongst the entire noble estate, and that their first obligation went to defending the “noble nation.” What my research suggests is the possibility that the ties uniting the nobility were hierarchical, more vertical than horizontal, and were based on networks of patronage, creating what Antoni Maczak calls a federation of great country houses. The horizontal ties could also have been strong, but would have been more local in nature – those of the local communities of the landed nobility. In this sense, then, my work suggests that even though the structure of the Polish-Lithuanian state was quite singular in Europe, one may find more similarities than differences between the Polish nobility and the service nobilities of its Northern-European neighbors.

Zusammenfassung

Nationale Polonien und naród szlachecki.
Zwei Mythen von nationaler Identität und adeliger Solidarität

Schwächer gestaltete sich die Analyse der Wendung „gente Ruthenus, natione Polonus“. Stanisław Orzechowski, der bislang als die einzige verbürgte Quelle galt, hat diese Bezeichnung niemals für sich selbst gewählt und lediglich zwei Mal eine ähnliche Benennung gebraucht: „gente Roxolanus, natione vero Polonus“. Orzechowski beanspruchte, sowohl Ruthene als auch Pole zu sein. Seine doppelte Identität ergab sich jedoch nicht aus einem Selbstverständnis als „politischer Pole“, vielmehr kann sie auf die Herkunft seiner beiden Familien zurückgeführt werden: Diejenige, der er den Familiennamen verdankte, stammte aus der Rus', der größere Clan, der Wappenverband, war in Polen beheimatet. In diesem Sinne war er zugleich „rodem z Rusi“ (aus der Rus’ gebürtig) und „rodem z Polski“ (aus Polen gebürtig). Mit anderen Worten, Orzechowskis polnische Identität rührt nicht allein von seiner Staatszugehörigkeit her, und mit Sicherheit war seine ruthenische Identität für ihn nicht zweitrangig. Folglich spiegeln Begriffe wie „Adelsnation“ oder „gente Ruthenus“ nicht die nationale Identität der Adeligen wider.
